"Boys," Barney Bear announced to Fuzzy and Wuzzy one sunny Friday afternoon, "I have a big surprise for you. Today you're going to start taking dancing lessons!"

"Oh, no!" Fuzzy groaned. Wuzzy made a sour face. "Not dancing lessons," they said. "We'd never live it down. Our friends would never speak to us."

Barney frowned. "Sorry," he said firmly, "but I've made all the arrangements. Your first lesson is for five o'clock."

The boys thought desperately of possible ways out of their predicament. Just as Barney started back into the house, Fuzzy stopped him. "We can't start dancing lessons today," he blurted. "It's Friday, the thirteenth!"

Barney threw back his head and laughed. "You'll never get away with that excuse," he guffawed. "I'm not superstitious."

"All the same," Wuzzy insisted darkly, "we just can't start today. It means bad luck! You wait and see!"

Later, Barney was still chuckling as he went into the garage to get his rake. "Friday, the thirteenth!" he snorted. "As if that really means anything."

Just at that moment, a dusty old mirror hanging on the wall above his workbench fell and shattered. Barney jumped back in alarm, remembering the old saying that a broken mirror brings seven years of bad luck. "What am I thinking of?" he murmured. "I don't believe those silly old wives' tales."

He started down the driveway, but stopped suddenly as a big black cat darted across his path. "Whoa!" Barney grunted. "A black cat is supposed to mean bad luck, too. Pure coincidence," he muttered shakily. "The world is full of black cats, and it doesn't mean a thing one way or another."

Nevertheless, as he walked along the side of the house, Barney was careful not to walk under a ladder that someone had left standing against the wall. As he passed the rose arbor, he suddenly halted again. The horseshoe that had always hung above it was pointing down, instead of up.

"When a horseshoe is upside down," Barney reflected nervously, "it means that all the good luck will run out of it."

The last occurrence was the straw that broke the camel's back. "There is no use tempting fate," Barney reasoned. "Too many strange things are happening. The boys are right. I'll go in now and cancel their dancing lesson."

As he went to the telephone, Barney heard the sound of low voices coming from the kitchen. He tiptoed quietly to the door and opened it just enough to peek in. To his surprise, Fuzzy and Wuzzy were sitting on the drainboard, fumbling with something in an open cupboard.

"This ought to do it," Fuzzy whispered. "When Uncle Barney opens the cupboard door, the salt will fall out and spill. Everybody knows that spilling salt is a sign of very bad luck."

"I sure hope the mirror and the black cat and the ladder work, too," Lloyd added.

At that moment, Barney stepped into the kitchen. The boys turned in surprise and blushed guiltily.

"Oh, hello, Uncle Barney," Fuzzy quavered.

"You know," Barney said sternly, "you were right about Friday, the thirteenth. It does mean bad luck... for you. It's time to get dressed for your dancing lesson."
